Haematotoxic effects of daunorubicin on bone marrow and splenic cells. Haematological toxicity was studied in mice receiving both saline (controls) or two doses of daunorubicin (10 and 7 mg/kg body weight (bw), i.p.). By means of flow cytometry, the haematological effects on murine splenic lymphocyte and bone marrow cells were characterized. In vivo treatment with daunorubicin induced a reduction in the total number of viable haemopoietic cells and mainly, of bone marrow, with a transient severe depletion of blast lymphocyte sub-populations. A more marked alteration of lymphocyte sub-populations (i.e. CD4+) was also observed in the spleen. Murine lymphocytes were also treated in vitro and the effects of daunorubicin were evaluated by analysing cell viability, cell proliferation and cytokine production. A significant reduction of bone marrow lymphocyte viability and a decrease of in vitro blast lymphocyte
